As Dublin grows and the need for more housing increases in the suburbs, we will need to spread further, however our current public transport is under pressure. It is not reasonable that a 5km journey on a public bus can take me between 1-1.5 hours leaving at 7.30, but it does because the Medieval city in which we live was never built for this level of traffic. This coupled with our need to reduce carbon emissions points to a need for a subterranean metro service. Why can every other major capital have one, but not us?
